CONFERENCES BETWEEN MUSICIANS AND STRAND THEATRE SEVERED

The controversy between Abe Davidson, owner of the Strand theatre, and Musicians' Protective union, No. 235, because of which Mr. Davidson closed his theatre about four weeks ago, was settled Tuesday by agreement at a conference of the parties concerned held in chambers with Judge Charles B. Walker in attendance.

Mr. Davidson had brought a petition for an injunction against the union, Frank G. Benson, Walter M. Lang, Fred N. Clark and William R. Stevens to restrain the union from preventing any member of the American Federation of Musicians from accepting employment offered by the plaintiff. After a lengthy discussion between V. P. A. Quinn and Charles Cassady for the plaintiff and Charles V. James and Thomas M. Skidde for the defendants, in which papers were submitted to Judge Walker, it was finally agreed upon to settle the matter without further court proceedings. The session in chambers was from 10 o'clock in the morning until nearly noon and then the plaintiff and defendants adjourned to the office of Mr. James, where the matter was more fully discussed until late in the afternoon, when the petition was withdrawn.

The agreement reached was that Mr. Davidson could secure a leader, male or female, a musician, to secure a high class of vaudeville and the very latest in the motion picture line.

When the time for the hearing approached the court room was packed with musicians, theatrical men and others interested in the case. The latter part of them remained until the conference was over, while others, anticipating a lengthy session, went about their day's work.

Thomas F. Gamble, assistant to National President Wagner of the American Federation of Musicians, was present at the conference, and through his efforts, together with the lawyers, the matter was adjusted satisfactorily to both parties.
